

The Pleasant and most Delightful History of Argalus and Parthaea

NEWLY REVIVED.

London Printed by T. H. for T. and J. Newell, in the Pleasant
Row, near the Strand. M. D. 1748.

TO THE READER.

Gentle Reader,

For your Delight and haraleſ Divertiſement, I have employed ſome vacant Hours to preſent You with this pleaſant (though mournful) History of the Renowned Argalus and fair Parthenice; Reviving what through time was almost brought to decay. The famous Quarles (in a Poetick strain) has made a very paſſionate deſcription of their unfortunate Lovers; which (if I judge aright) is onely fit for thoſe to read who are inſpired with the ſame Art. This I have formed in a more plain and eaſie Method, that it may universally be acceptable to all Capacities. The famous Sidney (of never-dying Memory) firſt laid the Foundation, on which we both have built; the Ground-work being ſo ſirm, I queſtion not but that the ſtructure will for Ages ſtand, and never fall, till al-

To the READER.

things find a general dissolution. You that are Lovers, here may learn true Constancy, having a Noble Pattern of both Sexes. And though you find they were unfortunate unto their deaths, yet let not that affright you, for now they enjoy each other happily, where no Demagogas can come to trouble them. In Argalus you may behold true Valour, and in Parthenia undefiled Chastity, and in them both true Love, which was inseparable. Sum up all Vertues in one word together, 'twas Argalus and Parthenia, who both being but one, did comprehend them all. Read then this little Book at your own leisure, and if by chance you shed a tear or two, you will not be the first that have Wept at these Lovers misfortunes. The Author, as he writ it, did begin with watery Eyes to moisten what he had Planted ; which being sprung up, and now at length grown to maturity, in this new dress it humbly begs your welcome ; which if it finds, the Author hath his Ends, and gives you Thanks ; who will ever be ready to serve you in works of this nature ;

W. P.

THE

The Pleasant and most Delightful HISTOIRE
O F
Argalus & Parthenia newly reviv'd.

The First Part.

C H A P. I.

The Description of Arcadia ; The Discovery of Parthenia's Parrentage, her Mothers Qualifications, with her own unparallel'd Beauty, Chasity, and sweet Disposition of Nature.

Arcadia was a Land so pleasant and delightful, that in former time it was admired of all the World; and to add to its glory, it was called by some The Heavenly Arcadia: and indeed it might very properly be so termed comparatively, for it was a place so full of peace and quietness, abounding with mirth and harmless Joys. No noise nor clamors of Wars did disturb the kind Shepherds, whilst they fed their numerous Flocks in the warm and fruitful Valleys, chunting forth melodious Songs; expressing the true and innocent love they did bear to the pritty Shepherdesses, that did keep their flock just by them, under the shaddow of the well-spread Trees, where the chirping Birds did assist them in their harmony: Sometimes those Shepherds on an Oaten Pipe would shew their untaught skill: Thus did they live like earthly Saints. But now to come to speak of the greatest excellency that the whole World did ever afford, Arcadia may boast her self above her Neighbouring Countries, having the pre-eminence before all other lands, to nourish and protect that only Phenix which ever was created; Heavens Divinity, Natures excellency, Beauties prodigalitie; the envy of her Sex, but the universal admiration of Mankind; the fair Parthenia here did draw her breath, in this Arcadia she kept her abode, blessed with her presence, whilst she there did live.

2 The pleasant and most delightful History

like. Parthenia ! that name alone would cause an abut reverence upon each Tongue that durst but utter forth the name sound thereof, least then should prophane it. From Noble Parentage she did descend, which here to name, would be a needless Task ; meeting in her birth rare perfections, shall omit to name her Pedigree, only suffice much in brief discover.

Her Mother was a Lady in Arcadia, still alive now, honourable in her time amongst the greate ladies of her Age, a Woman in her Conversation very faire, but slow to speak, but quick to hear, and too severe in giving Beauteous, as a hasty nature, and fierce to punish those that did at any time offend her : neither would she admit of contradiction in any of her designs which she had purposed to bring to effect. She was always charitable to the poor ; she was also very pious and zealous in her Religion ; but the greatest of all her glories was this . She was Mother to that incomparable fair Parthenia, whose powerful eyes had such a charming influence over the rest of her fellow-creatures, that with a frowning look she could strike dead the proudest Monarch that ever wallt on earth, and with a smile as soon she could revive. These Virgin blushes on her Cheeks, like Roses intermixt with Lillies, made her face loveli to each admiring gazet : not so much red nor too much white appeared, but of a rare complesure sweetly mixt, her curions Flaren Hair more fine than Silk untwisted, or smaller than those Thredds in Cobwebs spun, when at its full length it hung, it would reach down to her knees, so great an Ornament nature her fram'd before. Her Coral Lips, neither too thick ne to thin, would tempt a Saint to taste of so much Sweetnes. Her Pearl like Beads in equal order set, did grace her pretty Cheush. Her Neck more white than is the driven Snow, her Breasts weree small and round, her Walle you easliy might span, her Hands were white and small, her Fingers long and strait : Her other parts, which I durst not bids to name, without all doubt were equal in amiable with those which I already have described ; and since then ought to be concealed, I my selfe leave you to guess the rest.

Scd

Now I shall endeavour to give you a description of her Noble Vertues both Divine and Moral. Ver Chaliph does best conuise my Pen to give a large Character thereof; Diana and these Virgin Nymphs that did attend her, could not be more cauious of that rare jewel their Virginitie, than was the chaste Parthenia; no bawdry lookes from any Man, as yet could cause a sinke, to gife encouragement to riuals that she would yield to any loose company; at such a distance did she keepe her selfe from those that were lasciviously enclined, they ne're durst offer to attempt her Honour.

As for Divinitie she was nothing else, though young in years, yet old in Vertues race, her Spirit was of Pietie, her graver wit surpassed her tender age: Nor in all this did she at any time appear drowsie or melancholish, but on the contrary a brisk and lively spirit did possess her: Nor Passion, when moved to the verp height (which in others would turne to railing) could not properly in her be called Anger; but a moderate reproof she always gave the offender, mildly and gently shewing them their faultes, her words flowing from her as though they were weighed in the Ballance of Discretion, though not premeditated: Her Voice so sweet, that had she doom'd to Dye some unþorthy Criminal, he gladly would have undergone the Sentence.

To sum up all perfections in one line,
She was on Earth a Heavenly Cherubine.

C H A P. II.

The fable and lascivious Courtship which Demogorgon used to the fair Parthenia, with her modest denials to his lustful suit: Demogorgon receiving a gentle reproof from Parthenia, makes his speedy application to her Mother, to assist him in his love.

THIS rare Parthenia in her Blooming Age indued with all those Excellent Perfections both Natural and Divine, could not be clouded from the prying Eyes of all adjacent and admiring Mortals.

Faine

The pleasant and most delightful History

Fame with Swift Wing and Trumpet loud, proclaims her worf and beauty to all degrees of Men: She is now become the Table-talk at Feasts, each Artist strives to write or paint her glory; Healths round to sweet Parthenia are at even Banquet drank by those that never saw her; the Poet in a Napture, being high flown, stiles her to be a Demi-God desy of some Satyr, and so proceeds to immortalize her Name, ne never able to proclaim one part of those Endowments which really she inherites.

The Chief of Painters must be doing too, he strives to set forth Demayor to the life, and looking on fair Venus Image, he with tempting eyes disposes it, and drawes Parthenia's features far more rare; and when he has done, falls down on his knees, and reverently worships what he made.

Among the rest of these admirers, There was a great Ithonian Herd, who dwelt upon the Coasts of Arcadia, Demaylor he haue, a Sonne of great command, but of an ill shape, being very tall and lean, ha' old cheekes, and of a swathy Countenance, goggie eyed, his long Chin turning up to his Nose, on which there grew two harsh and long tuſſocks of unseemly Hair, his body all over hairy, insomuch that he appeared monſteous to any eueng creature: He was of a croſſe nature, his inward disposition being agreeable to his outward form, in all Vice he was expert, but hated the leall ſhew of Virtue, or any that pretended to it.

This Monſter of a man did chance to view the lovely Parthenia's face, which having ſeen, her amorous Beauty druck him in amazement, and hiftful love over to helme his rugged ſpirit; but how to quench thofe raying Flames he ſhouſt not; in the heat of burning love he thus breathes forth in ſecret his owne ſorrow, and thus complains:

Oh foolish fond Demaylor, what ails thy breaſt to burn with an unusual heat! Can one poor look on Beauty thus diſturb my Soul?
muſt I endure the rage and ſird no eafe nor cure? No, no, I find the ſcorching flames' encrease: Cannot the Gods ſind out an eali-er way to torment lovers? Alas ſome help, or elſe I dye? what ſhall I do? the wound grows worse and worse: Give eafe, ſe Powers above, or elſe I will ſwear you are unjust: why did you ſend yon

your beauteous Angel down thus to torment me, except you do intend this self same hour to wound her heart with equal pain as mine is? But why shou'd I implore your helping hand, when 'tis not in your power to ease me? It must be she that gave the wound can cure it, the fair Parthenia; none but she alone can quit Demoras from his cruel pain. In vain I utter words unto the Air, she hears me not, nor did she hear, I doubt she would not pity me. But, why do I thus long unman my self? I'll cheer up all my Spirits, and begin to think upon some new device to gain some favour from this Cruel Fair: But why do I call her cruel, that never tryed whether she were inclin'd to love or not? She is a Woman, and a fair one too, and with fair Speeches Women must be won. I'll mollifie the fierceness of my nature, and learn for once to flatter for my own ends.

Thus did the raging Lover strive to help his troubled mind by talking to himself, sometimes imagining that he should gain a Conquest over this Fair Virgin Lady: then by and by his Spirits would sink down, and fear would quite deprive him of his hopes. But now at length he can brook no delay, but resolves to let Parthenia know he loves and honours her, and not onely so, but languishes all day and night in flames of Love for her fair Beauty, which unless he does enjoy, his life will soon expire: and thus he first bespeaks her:

Madam, To call you Fair, were too low a Title for so much Divinity; besides, it would be no Lustre to your Merits: yet 'tis true, and the whole world, that ever saw your face, knows you are fair: but I know more than that, I find you are amiable, and so beautiful, that one sweet glance from those all-piercing Eyes, would even strike dead the cruellest of all Tyrants, and make him bow his head, and prostrate lye flat on the Earth, just at Parthenia's feet; not able any more to rise, until she with a smile breaths life into his Breast. This, dear Parthenia, is my own condition: Look down upon Demoras with pity, let sighs and tears speak for a dying Lover: Nature that curiously hath plaid her part in framing such a Rarity as you, did never intend that your Virginity shou'd dye with you, and never be enjoy'd. Remember, Madam, who it is that asks this favour of you for to kiss your hand; I am no common Begger, 'tis well known, nor am I basely born, though at your feet I throw my self, and humbly do submit before your presence. To me this Trade is new, for never before this time I either begg'd of either man or woman; yet Queens to me have sought to enjoy my love, but have been slighted by Demagoras, that now makes his humble Supplication to you my dear Parthenia. Speak comfort, speak my Love, and ease my poor heart;

*That bleeds incessantly without redress,
Your Love will make me great, you ne'r the less.*

The blushing Virgin hearing what was said, amazed at his hot Love, could scarcely tell how on a sudden to make a Reply; the Rosie Colour from her sweet Cheeks did fly, and paleness did overspread her Countenance, then by and by her Colour would come again: at length her passion did her silence break, and with an angry Countenance and stedfast look, she modestly reproved his Suit and Love, admitting him no favour in her presence: thus she began to make her short Reply.

My Lord, Were I guilty of that Crime which most of my Sex are possessed with (which is self-conceit, especially when they are flattered) you now would make me so proud, that I should neither know you, nor my self: but I have not so good a conceit of my own perfections (as you call them) if I have any, as to think my self a fit person to enjoy that man, to whom Queens have made their Application and have been deny'd; But this I must think, you spoke only to please me, and to tempt me, as men do Children, and I should be of all most unworthy, if I should not thank you for't. Alas! my Lord, you ask my heart, which yet I cannot spare to you, nor any other man; besides, if I were minded to bestow it, 'twould be too mean a present for your Honour to accept of. I rather do believe what you have told me, that it must be some Queen, or something above that Title, that can be a fit Comfort for so Honourable a Person as your Lordship: Some honest Ruslick Swain perhaps may serve Parthenia's turn. Therefore my Lord, 'tis better to desist, and let not such low thoughts thoughts breed your disquiet, as you preterd they do. Go home and take your rest, consider well what folly you commit in this attempt, and when you are well advis'd, you'll find that I am not cut out for to enjoy that Noble Heart that Queens can't gain with begging. I hope you soon will see your own mistake, 'twas only some sad melancholly fit that brought you hither to help to divert that tedious time, and cause some pastime to arise from my simplicity ; but let it be how 'twill, I please my self with true simplicity, and count my Maidenhead a greater Honour than to be the greatest Countess in the whole World.

Demogoras hearing this sudden and subtile Nepli, was much disquieted in his mind ; neither could he take occasion to be enraged at any of her words : for she answered him in such a smiling posture, that her very denial seemed to be but a wanton dalliance : yet in every word she utter'd, there was such force and power, that his Spirits were damp'd, and he plainly perceived that she slighted his Love, and that there was no likelihood for him to speed : he fell into a deep despair, and drew his Sword, intedning to offer violence upon his own Body, but a second thought arising, did presently prevent his committing an outrage. His present resolution was, to make his speedy Application to Parthenia's Mother, and to tell her that he chanc'd to see her Daughter, and was so much in love with her, that unless she prov'd kind, he should never enjoy himself so long as he liv'd. Thus having well prepared himself, he makes haste and goes to the Castle where she dwelt, and with abundance of Dissembling, and good store of Complements, he thus Addresses himself to her.

Madam, As an humble Supplicant, who stands condemn'd for his life, begs hard and eagerly for the Judges mercy, so I am now become your sad Petitioner, and unless you will grant my request, and give ease to my disquieted mind, I am certainly ruined, and shall surely sink under the burden of my affliction. Oh Parthenia, Parthenia, 'tis thou alone must ease me, or I dye ! Oh Madam, your fair Daughter with her piercing Eyes, hath wounded Demogoras to the very heart, and now so great her cruelty is towards me, that seemingly slighted my profered Love and Service, bet in you dear Madam, I have yet some hope of comfort let.

And my humble request is, That you would be pleased to speak kindly to the fair Parthena: concerning me, and try if you can move her heart to love, if not, to pity me. I would not Madam, give you this great trouble, but that I know there's none that she will harken to but you; perhaps your words may work upon her Spirits, and cause her to prove kind to me her poor distressed Lover.

C H A P. III.

Parthena's Mothers fair Promises to Demagoras, to assist him in persuading her Daughter to accept his Love; with the several Discourses between Parthena and her Mother, about her marrying with Demagoras.

Demagoras having thus finished his Discourse, Parthena's Mother makes him this Sceply.

My Honourable Lord, If this your Love which you have discovered unto me concerning my Daughter, be Real and Cordial, without dissembling, I give your Lordship that ks, and must commend your Honours Wisdom in applying your self to me, for she, alas, is Young and Childish, and knows not how to make her Choice as yet; but I my Lord, have seen more of the World, and better know how to dispose of her, than she of her self; and I question not, but she will in all things obey my Commands, and I my Lord will surely be your Friend in this matter: refer the whole businesse to me, and I will act in your behalf; but be you of good Cheer my Lord; and be not at all discomfited, but within a short time boldly make Love to her again, and I'll prepare the way before you.

Demagoras hearing this, just like a Man who from a Dungeon deep wherein he had leng been confin'd, was now set at liberty: even so was he rejoiced when he heard the words of comfort which proceeded from Parthena's Mother: and giving her a thousand thanks for her great proffer'd kindness, he took his leave of her for that time ; blessing his Stars that did conduct him to her in so happy an hour, for now he had received some comfort to his Love-sick mind.

Demagoras now being gone full of joy and gladness for the good success he had received that day, the Antient Lady, Parthenia's Mother (the Sun being almost set) was willing to recreate her self in her own Flowry Walks, which led into a curious shady Grove adiourning to her Castle : and as she walk'd, she mus'd of what she had heard from Demagoras, and with her self, concludes that his Suit must not be deny'd, for he was a great Man, and of a Noble Family, whose Fortune none could equal in the whole Land that were of his quality, for he abounded in Wealth and Riches, insomuch that he knew no end of his Estate. The consideration of this was enough to tempt any Woman that was past the pleasures of Youth, and had now betaken her self to the World ; but lest her Daughter should mislike his Face, and the shape of his Body, She was resolv'd to flatter her at first with fair Speeches, supposing that she would at all times hearken unto her Mother.

As the Old Lady was thus walking, and thinking of this great Concern, it happened so, that the Path wherein she was going, brought her within the sound of fair Parthenia's Voice, and looking round about, at length she did esp' her pretty Daughter in a pleasant Bower all alone, with a Book before her, and being not far from her, she was resolv'd to see how she behaved her self: the sweet Parthenia (not thinking any one so near her) was reading the sad Story of Chariclea's Love, which often made her Blush, and sometimes Weep ; then shutting up her Book, thus to her self she speaks :

How C'rew i: the fate of poor distressed Lovers, who never are at rest, but always tossed to and fro with one vexation or other? in the midst of all their Joys some Troubles will still intercede, which disturbs them, and causes discontent.

After she had repeated this Words with a sorrowful Note, she fetches several deep sighs proceeding from the bottom of her Heart, seeming to pity poor Lovers miserable condition.

Her Mother hearing those Words the fair Parthenia uttered in the Bower, and well observing her Sighs and Tears, steps forth and hastens to the Bower, discovering her self to her Pensive Daughter. Parthenia seeing her Mother, was amazed and ashamed, fearing she had over-heard and seen her passionate Words and Affections, which indeed she had, but it was unknown to Parthenia; At length her Mother seeing of her blush, and that she was ashamed of what she had said and done, gently and mildly she speak to her after this manner.

Blush not my dear Parthenia, why, what's the matter? art thou ashamed, or do'st thou fear to see thy loving Mother? Come come, let Blushes cease; what though thou art in Love and willing to conceal it, was not I thy Mother so before thee? I know that stolen pleasures are the sweetest, I am sure I found them so in my Youthful days? and art not thou my own Daughter? Yes, sure thou art, and it is reason good that thou should'st follow thy Mothers Example, and hearken to her good admonition, by being secure by her directions in all things; you know I love you well, my dear Parthenia, and like a loving Mother will always advise you for the best. Come my Child, be not so melancholly, what? I perceive the young Laconian Lord Demagras, has been with you to day, and I supposed hath talked of Love to you, which you perhaps, as yet don't understand; But 'tis no matter, prithee Child don't fear, in those Concerns thy Mother is well skill'd, and I will help thee out in every thing that he shall ask or say to thee, therefore Parthenia, blush not to let me know the secrets of thy heart: what if thou lov'st him well, that shall not anger me, for I would have thee love him, and become his Wife; for he is Rich, and sprung from Noble Blood, his Pedigree is derived from a Kingly Race; Honour and Wealth dwells with him, and nothing to him is wanting, that heart can wish or desire. Your Fortune is mean compar'd to his, then let not his fierce Suit receive denial, but bid him Welcome; for if you should miss of him, I fear you will never have the like proffer. What though you are fair and beautiful, that will not last, but fade like to the Flowers of the Field, and so decays ; and when a Maid is once accounted old and stale, she never must expect preferment all her Life time. Consider of what I have said to you, my dear Parthenia, and be not over coy, nor too much proud of any of your Vertues, but take the present opportunity, whilst it is to be had, for time once past can never be recalled.

Flowers

The sweet Parthenia hearing her Mother subtilly plead for Demagoras his Love, like a dutiful Daughter return'd her this Answer.

Madam, as I am your only Daughter, I know I am bound in Duty to obey your Commands in all things that are lawful ; and upon my knees, I give you humble thanks for your care of me, and your kind wishes towards me. 'Tis true, the young Laconian Lord Demigoras, has tendered his Love and Service to me in a high manner, but I never gave him the least encouragement to make a farther Progress in his Love. He without doubt may have Fortunes far above my Merits, as he himself hath confess'd to me already, that Queens have made Suit to him for Marriage, and they have gone away discontented, he not accepting the proffers of their Loves : Then why should I aspire to that degree of Highness, who am inferiour to those he has denied ? No, I am not yet resolved to marry with any, therefore his Suit to me will be in vain ; and when you see him Madam, pray tell him so.

C H A P. IV.

The Marriage of Basilus, King of Arcadia, with Gynecia, the King of Cypres Daughter, with the Ceremonies of the Wedding. The manner of the Tilts and Turnaments, as they were Performed at the Solemnization of King Basilus his Marriage, together with the Valorous Acts of Manhood that were perform'd by Argalus at that time, a Cyprian Prince.

But before we proceed any farther with the Story of Parthenia's Love, I must let you know of the happy Marriage of Basilus King of Arcadia, who Marryed the famous and exceeding beautiful Princess Gynecia, the King

King of Cypris his Daughter, a Woman of an excellent Deportment, endow'd with Natures chiefest Ornamentes, Both outwardly and inwardly; for as she was incomparably Fair, so in like manner was her mind adorne'd with Wisdom and Discretion.

When the good King Basilius, brought home to the Arcadian Court his new Espoused Queen Gynecia, there came a long with her a great Train of Princes, Lords, and Famous Knights, with abundance of Gentry, which were of her own Country, all being attired with Habitments of War, each of their Armours of a different Hue, some guilt
with Gold, some shined with Silver bright, and others Enamell'd with divers Colours, that they were most Glorious to behold. These valiant Cyprian Nobles willing to shew the Arcadian Court some pastime, desired the King that he would set apart Three days for their recreacion, which Basilius easly granted.

The Spayt was this. They met upon a Plain, near to the Court, the Cyprian Knights and Nobles plac'd themselves on one side of the Plain, and the Arcadian Knights and Nobles opposite against them at a good distance, all of them well mounted upon good Steeds, and with their Armour ferd upon their Bodies, and Helmets upon their Heads, with Spears in their Hands, and Swords on their Sides; Seats were built up for the King and Queen, & therest of the Nobility, that they might with ease behold the Actions of those Famous Champions. They being thus plac'd, the Arcadian Trumpets sound, & soorth comes a valiant Warriour, mounted on his prancing Steed, & singly shews himself upon the Plain; but long he had not pared his Horse about the List, but the shill note of the Cyprian Trumpets gave notice that there was a noble Combatant coming forth, that willingly with him would try his Skill and Courage: the Trumpets sound again, then both advance their Spears, and with a full Career rid one against another; the Arcadian Knight rid with such speed and force against the other Knight, that with his Spear
the very first time he met, he thrust him from his Saddle, and down he fel upon the Ground breathless, being depriv'd of Life or Sense at present, but was immediately taken up and carried out of the List, where using a means for his recovery, they soon brought him to himself again; but after him, another of his Country-men came forth, who riding fiercely at the Arcadian Knight, and striking at him with great force, mist his blow, and flung himself from off his Horse, and puts his Shouder out, so that he was disabled for riding any more. But after him came forth a Man indeed, Prince Argalus, who was in Cypru, born, his Armour was emboss'd and gilt with Gold, his Milk-white Steed was of a curious shape, and in his Helmet he had a Plume of White Feathers fastned on his forehead in a cluster of Diamonds; the Trumpets sound again, and the Valiant Prince sets Spurs unto his Horse; who ran with such a violent force against the Arcadian Knight, that with his Spear, and strength of his stout Horse, he flung both Horse and Man several pards from him; at which brave Manlike Act, the King with the rest of his Nobles, did shout amain, the noise whereof did make the ground to tremble. Then several others of the Arcadian Land, did one after another endeavour to regain that day's lost Honour; but all in vain they strove, for Argalus did still Victorious ride, and in Triumphant manner shewed himself before the King and Queen, and the Ladies of Honour, who were there present to behold the Sport.

C H A P. V.

How Parthenia fell in Love with Argalus, as she beheld him at the Turnaments, as also how at the self same time Argalus was enamour'd with her Beauty. Parthenia's Mothers Dream, making her own Interpretation of it, how that Parthenia should Marry with Demagoras; but Parthenia Interprets it to be Argalus, with whom she was to Wed.

Amongst the rest, the fair Partheria was there, to behold the Pastimes, who cast an Amorous eye upon Prince Argalus all the while he was in the List. She look'd so long upon him, that her looks became to liking, and her liking to real Love. So craftily the God of Love had played his part that day, that at one instant he had wounded both Argalus and Parthenia with equal flames: for she could not more admire his Valour and Behaviour then he admired her Excellent Beauty. But now the day being spent, the King Commands the Ceremony for that time to cease, so home they went unto the Kings blesse Palace, Where after Supper, they spent most part of the Night in Reveling and Dancing; each took the Lady that did like him best. But Noble Argalus did privately secure the sweet Parthenia, who gladly did seperate her self from the rest of the Company to be alone with him: he then discovered the Love he bore unto her, in the greatest passion that Lover e're expres'd, she was no less willing to accept it, then he was to proffer it, insomuch that at that time, they to each other Swore a faithful Constancy to their Lives end, and Seal'd their Promises with Sugred Kisses.

They had not long been there together, but in comes Parthenia's Mother, missing her Daughter amongst the rest of the young Ladies, being jealous of what indeed she found was true; but her presence made Argalus Withdraw, being satisfied in himself, that he had made sure of Parthenia's Parthenia's Note and best Affection. Now Argalus being gone, Parthenia's Sister began to bid her Daughter for leading the Ladies, and keeping Company with any Man. Without her knowledge; but which she did not say concerning that, having a Stompe to tell her, which was a Dream she had Dreamt the night before: and thus she did begin.

Last night (my dearest Child, quoth she) no rest could close my eyes, nor cause me for to sleep, my mind was much disturb'd, I tos'd and tumbled, but could no quiet find; my Roving Fancy would not let me sleep, till that the shrill note of the watchful Cock proclaimed the dawning of the day was nigh; I then did fall into a silent slumber, and as I lay, I Dreamt this Dream; sit down, and I will tell it you.

Methoughts I saw thee, my dear Child, sitting like a Princely Bride, drest with Robes befitting, Stately Majelty, a Cypress wreath did adorn thy Temples, and at the nine months end thou wast delivered of a curious Boy. Methoughts that Juno did descend from Heaven and came into thy Chamber, and taking the pretty Babe in her Arms, she kissing it, did Ues the smiling Boy, and set a Glorious Crown of pure Gold upon his pretty Head, of which the strugling Infant seemed proud. Methoughts great Jove did thunder from above, and after that like to a Storm of Hail, he shou'red down great store of Pearl and Gold. See here (says Juno) to you, great Jove has sent these as a present, rise up and fetch them in. Then after this she vanisht out of sight, and I awaked from this Golden Dream; and now my Fancy tells me this Dream must needs prove true, and I liked it very well, because it has foretold thy Marriage: and the shower of Gold betokens Wealth; but what the Cypress Wreath should mean, I cannot tell. Submit thy will, my dear Parthenia, to what the Gods have allotted for thee, and by the Duty of a Daughter, I now Conjure thee to set thy Love on Noble Demagoras, the Gods have said it, and it must be so, 'tis he I am sure must be the Man I Dreamt on: therefore accept his kind preffers, and be no longer nice, for 'tis my mind, and you must not withstand it.

She having made an end of her Dream, you may guess Parthenia was in no small trouble how to answer her Mother in this case, and not displease her; for she must either prove undutiful to her Mother, in saying she would not have Demagoras, or else she must prove disloyal to her dearely belov'd Argalus, whom she priz'd above all the World. At length she thus resolv'd to displease her cruel Mother, in denying her Choice, and thought it a less Sin to be counted undutiful to her, than to break her Pow'r with him, who had the possession both of Heart and Soul. And thus she answered her:

Madam, your Care and double Diligence, I must confess, has been towards me, as hath become a most Indulgent Mother; yet, in these your last Commands, you seem to be more cruel then ever you have been kind; desiring, or rather forcing me to love the Man whom above all other I utterly abhor, though as to hatred my passion never hitherto has moved me. Demagoras can in my Breast have no share of love, my affections are already pitch'd upon the Man I am resolv'd to make my Husband, if I may have your good will, and good liking in this my choice; if not, I willingly will submit to what your pleasure shall require; but not to match my self with the Laconian Lord, but by Death Ie gladly satisfie your utmost Rage. Speak Mother, what you now will have me do, Parthenia willingly does here resign her Body as a Pledge of her Obedience, either to dye, or for ever to enjoy my Argalus, the betrothed Husband of your afflicted Daughter. I am his Wife, and never will forsake him while Life remains, or I can name that name of Argalus: therefore pray urge no more concerning Demagoras, for now you know the meaning of your Dream. Argalus is that Cypres Wreath which you Dreamt should encompas round your poor Parthenia, this on my knees I beg that you will grant, or quickly eas me of my misery.

C H A P. VI.

How Parthenia's Mother was angry with her for not agreeing to Marry Demagoras, and how she designs to poysone Argalus. How Parthenia's Mother writ a Letter in Parthenia's Name, and sent Parthenia's Maid Athelia, with a Bottle of rank Poyson to Argalus.

HE Mother hearing this, infurious rage went out of the Chamber, and left her kneeling, without the least pity, of giving any comfort to the distressed Virgin; and speedily sent for Demagoras to come to her, who quickly came, and to him she related her Daughters Resolution; and withal assured him, that there could be expected no kindness from her Daughter so long as Argalus did live, but if he were dispatch'd, she thought that then she might be workt upon. This base Demagoras did straightway swear that he would soon remove that Rival out of the way, and vow'd his Sword should shorten his days, and quickly spoil his Amorous Love. But the Old Lady told him, 'twas not safe for to Encounter with so bold an Enemy, for he perhaps might miss his intended blow, and then the Plot would quite be spoild and ruined, and withal told him that she knew a far safer way to destroy him, by giving him some Poisonous Drugs to Drink, and they would surely send him to the Grave. So she desired that the Design might be wholly left to her self, for she alone would be his Executioner. Demagoras hearing this, consented to her will, and for that time departed.

Now the Old Ladies Brains did cast which way to bring this Witches privately about, at last she thus concludes, That Athelia, Parthenia's Maid, would be a fit Messenger to convey the Poison to Argalus; she thereupon calls Athelia into her Closet, and asks her flatteringly, if that she could keep a Secret if it was committed to her charge: the Maid answered, Yes Madam, any thing that you you desire me, shalke easelby lode within my Breast, and never be revealed in ali my life time. The Oid Lady ther takes Pen, Ink, and Paper, and writes after this manner to Argalus, in Parthema's Name.

Parthena to Argalus.

MY dear Argalus, though we cannot meet together and see one another so often as I wouid, yet assure your self, that I am still constant to you, and ever will be, to my Dea h. I haue here sent you a little Glas of Cordial Spirits, which will keep you from the infection of any Distemper, therefore pray accept of it, and drink it all off at one draught for her sake, who is, and ever will be yours till Death,

Parthema.

C H A P. VII.

How Parthema's Maid Athelia tasted of the Poyson by the way she went, and fel down Dead immeniatly ; which when Parthema's Mother understood, she quickly after Dyed with raging Madness.

She having ended this her counterfeit Letter, she Seals it up, and gives it to the Maid Athelia, with the little Viol of Poisen, and charg'd her the next moring early to rise and carry it to Argalus, and say that Parthema sent it him ; the Maid promised that her desire should be performed, and so departed from her, and went to Bed : but all that night she could not sleep a wink, but as she stumbered, strange Dreams did affright her of Dead Men and Burials, she not thinking what shoulde be the cause. However the morning coming, she arose, and was resolued to carry the Glas and Letter to Argalus ; But being gone a little way from home, she, like the rest of Women kind desirous to taste of the forbidden fruit, uncozles the Glas, and tast what was within it. But she had not gone far afterwards, before she found by woulf experience, she was Poysoned ; for so violent was the Doze which Argalus was so Dzink, that two or three drops kill'd Athelia, in half an hours time, so that she fel down dead upon the bier, and soon afterwards was found by some that knew her, with the Letter in her bosome, and the Glass in her hand; which Letter being broke open, the hand was strokin, and and the Treachery which was designed upon Argalus was discouered, and soz that time happily prevented.

Parthenia's Mother hearing how her Malice was put by, and knowing that all the World would cry out shame of those her horrid Intentions, betakes her self into a private Room, and cursing her ill success in not killing Argalus, she grew Distracted, and with raging Madness, without remorse of her past Actions dyed, and decently was Buried by her sorrowful Daughter Parthenia; whose tender heart did much lament her losse, though had she lived, she would have ruined her, by causing her to have Marryed with Demagoras, though she had often told her that she could not love him, but now that trouble is past and at an end.

How loud mouth'd Fame does clap her nimble Wings, then stretching of them forth, away she flies, to tell the neighbouring Countries round about of Envies sudden fall, and Vertues preservation, the Death of Parthenia's Mother, and Athelia, Parthenia's Maid, as they were prosecuting the over-thow of the Innocent, Vertuous, Noble, and most renowned Prince Argalus. Some grieve'd to hear the news, but others had cause sufficiently to rejoice: you well may guess that Argalus did not mourn, for why, indeed he had no cause, but rather to rejoice; for Heaven that's always just, had now remov'd the only Enemy he had in the World, the meck Parthenia's cruel Mother.

Now might the Worthyp Prince have free liberty to visit his Parthenia when he pleases: They soon together meet, where joys abound, all sorrows now do cease, and kisses sweet supply the place of tears.

In harmless mirth they spend sweet time away,
And now begin to talk o'th' Wedding-day.

The Pleasant and most Delightful Hi- story, of ARGALUS and PARTHENIA, &c.

The Second PART.

C H A P. I.

How Argalus appoints the Wedding-day, and how he was disappointed by Demagoras his Cruelties, which he shew'd to the fair Parthenia.

Now both the Vertuous Lovers do agree to appoint a certain day to consummate their joys, that as their hearts already are together firmly joyned, so their hands might also be united by Marriage. The time and very day is now pitch'd upon, and Argalus with a Thousand Sing red Kisses takes leave at present of his dearest Parthenia, that so he might make preparation against that time, which he hop'd would prove a blessed and happy hour. He invites the Neighbouring Princes to his Wedding, whilst Sweet Parthenia is not less busie than himself, in getting all things in a readines against her Famous Bridegroom's coming; she gallantly bedeckis her Bride Chamber, expecting there the next night after, to beshow her Maidenhood upon her dearest and best Beloved Argalus.

But gentle Reader, if ever thou didst shed a tear, weep now at this most cruel change of Fortune, their repin'd joys are blasid in a moments time: Alas poor Lovers, they for a fortnights Joy, are like to undergo a whole Years torment, nay, 'tis a doubt whether they may ever meet again. The grievous and most lamentable accident of their misfortunes, if sorrow will give me leave, I'll now unfold unto you: let you relenting hearts with mine bear

Dear part in this sad Relation of these two Lovers misery.

The very day that was appointed for their Marriage being now at hand, and the Morning was set bynt, and no Argalus as yet was come: his dear Parthenice standing at his stan, sometimes complain'd of his forgetfulness; and walking forth into a handsome Bower, where she might see her dearest when he came, there all alone she solitary sat down, but no sweet Bridgeman could she see esp. Grief now began to over whelme her Spirits, and often did she call upon her Love, crying out aloud, Alas! Alas! Oh Argalus! my Dear, come away, thy Dear Parthenice wants thee, sure thou canst not forget this is the day appointed: thou art not founmindful of thy longing Bride. No, no, it can not be, I rather fear some great and sudden misfortune has befallen thee, that has thus long prevented thy coming to me. I know thou lovest me, and will not neglect me: if Life and Health will suffer thee to rise out of thy Bed, I am sure I shall not be long without thy company. I by constancy I must not, neither can I doubt, because I know my Argalus is faithful to his own Parthenice. Thus to her self sometimes she did complain, then byn and byn she seem'd for to be comforted, chearing and pleasing her self to think that he was Loyal, and that he loved her, and none but her alone. Many a long and sorrowful look she cast upon the Road whiche way he was to come, and every little Bird that flutter'd by her, and made but the least noise amoungst the Boughs, she started up, thinking her Argalus had unawares surpriz'd her as she watch'd him; but now behold, instead of Argalus, there came the furious and revengeful Demagoras, and violently he lays his hands upon her tender body, then taking her fast by the curious hair, which grew most decently upon her head, drags her on the ground, then stops her mouth, lest that her shrieks should cause some sudden help to her assistance, and he thereby should miss of his most damn'd and barbarous mischievous Design. Her Handkerchief he rent from off her Neek, and with his cruel hand he crush it into her Mouth, so far, that she could scarcely fetch her her breath: the infumme wretch did thus hispeak to the poor distressed miserable Virgin. Now, base unworthy Strumpet (quoth he) for all thy slighting Language, I will take a full revenge on thy bewitching Beauty, it never more shall tempt another Man. How durst you be so v'le to think of Marriage joys so quickly after the Death of thy dear Mother, which was occasioned by thy Disobedience? thy high-flown pride could not admit of my loving embraces, the Wealth and Honour which I do enjoy, with all the flatteries I could invent; nor yet your too indulgent Mothers intreaties, nor her forc'd frowns, could bend your stubborn and perverse inclinations. You in all haste, forsooth, must Marry with the Cyprian Prince, and none but he shall share in your affections; yes, he shall have you, if he please, but I'll endeavour to blunt the sharp edge of his hot-burning Love.

These, with the like false and blasphemous words, he utter'd forth from his most filthy mouth: the poor Parthe-nia, with her mouth close stopt, lay almost Dead with his most cruel usage; and so to finish his last intended mischief, he had a Glass of black and deadly Popson, which he did pour upon her pretty Face, her Face, that all which ever saw it, did cause to blesse themselves with admiration. This sweet and more than Beautiful Face, those lovely features, which did once appear so amorous and so glorious, that the God of Love wou'd oft take Wing, and from his Throne descend, to sport and play with fair Parthenia's Cheeks: those Cheeks I say are now become most loathsome, the strong and venomous Popson soams
and works upon her tender Face, and caus'd great Blis-ters so to rise, and swell to such a bigness, that her pure skin did crack and burst in sumbee.

This being done, Demagoras matten hastie, and hemic in to his Cabin he goes with all the speed imaginable, fearing least some of her Attendants missing her, should make a diligent search and found her out.

Thus did he leave the poor Parthenia upon the ground quite desperate of Life, not thinking, nor desiring ever to recover: but when this monstrous cruel Devil had left her, she summond all the frens, & fetch'd together, and hood upon her Face, and pulling from her Head to hide her sore deform'd Face, privately she did her self into an outward Chamber where there was water. This Room was never light at Mean Day, but alwayes dark, & is the darkest night, when neither Moon nor Stars be like to appear.

Upon this Bed she throwes her self, besyng nede to Die;
but with a sigh these words she did repeat: Oh Argalus, my dearest Argalus, hadst thou been here, this mishief had not been now, I would rather thou sholdst yet come, since that thou canst not give me ease, nor help my cruel fate which now is pale.
Ah woful Wedding-day! my joys are turned to sorrow, and here is none to pity me. But why shold I desire to see my Loves Eyes, since mine are not fit to look upon him? how uncertain are these Worldly pleasures? one moment brings a sudden alteration, and turns oft times chiefest delights into the greatest mirth, our mirth into sorrow, and joys into bitter mourning.
She having thus complained to her self a while, and with a multitude of sighs, and floods of tears, bewail'd her woful fortune, Argalus came.

C H A P. II.

Now Argalus comming, and expecting to Marry with his Parthe-nia, found her upon a Bed in a dark Room, with her Face all besmeared over with Poyson; together with their Lamentations.

By this time Argalus was come into the Castle, and made a strict enquiry after her, but none could tell him whither she was gone; he then enraged, searches up and down, but could not find her: at length being come into the next Room, he heard a bitter and most lamentable groaning, with sighs enough to pierce a heart that's made of Stone, the sound whereof did bring him to this Chamber, where nothing but thick darkness did appere; and by her sighs

at last he left the Bed, and sate daleud, Who is't, say'st thou, that here doth lye, and thus bemoans themselves? With that the sighing laps, Oh trouble not thy self to know further, it is not thy Parthenia; enquire no more. He then replies, Who is that which tells me so? Although I cannot see thy Face, yet sure I am that is Parthenia's Voice; O why should my dearest, sweet Parthenia, deny her self to her beloved Algates? I am sure thou art Parthenia. Come, let me know what causeth this great sorrow to oppres thy innocent Soul? Tell me, my dearest, tell me. Accursed darknes, why dost thou deny me for to see her Face; be gone, I here conjure thee to be gone. Creep into Dungeons deep, and there abide, or rather snae down quickly into Hell, and dwell amongst the Damned, who delight in Darknes. Our harmless Breasts ne'r harboured any Crimes, but what might well appear in the open light. Deny no longer thy most pleasant Name; Parthenia's name alone, has power enough to raise a Man half dead, to Life again. She then replies, with bitter sighs and greans, Oh Algates! I think on that Name no more, wrong not thy Noble Soul so much, as ever more to remember that thou hast heard Parthenia spoken of: Be fortunate and great in some other Love, and for ever happy live, till thy Old Age shall call thee to the Grave.

Oh why should bleis'd Parthenia think, that Algates ever had so false a heart, to say he loved more than his own Life, and can so soon forget her very Name, denying both her Name and Love together. I hope you do not think what you command; as soone may great and lofty Mountains forlike their proper places, and like to winged Birds, fly swiftly through the Air, and all things, decline and change their natural qualities, as Algates can forget his own Parthenia.

Thus having ended, in a Love sick passion, he leaveth the Room, and hastily calls to the Servants to bring him up a light, which quickly they performed, and gave him in his hand a burning Taper, which did cast great light.

Then back again unto the Bed he goes, and drawing back the Curtains, there he finds his dear Parthenia's face so much deformed, that grief would suffer him to look no more upon her, but down he drops upon the Floor, and in a swoon lay dead a pretty while: at length recovering

Argalus, artise'st up, and looks again: the dreadfull sight too strange to narration, insomuch, that sometimes he woul'd talk unto the blazing Taper after this manner:
Be gone this light, be gone, thou dost but mock me; Parthenia, wondrous Beauty, and incomparable Features, cannot be thus transmuted into this monstrosous and dreadfull Condition.
thy light is false, and faire thou art incinated; I now will put thee out, and be no longer thus deceived by thee. With that he blow'd it out, and yet the flaine return'd back and burn'd again a fresh; at which the sorrowful Argalus cast a smile, and cheer'd himself with comfortable thoughts. Who knows (quoth he) but that this Taper reviving of it self again, after I had blown it out, may signifie Parthenia's and my own fortune, which is to come: Although the angry Gods, being too much envious at our happiness, have at present blotted and extinguished all our joys, and sweet content, yet hopes do still remain, that like this Taper in a little time, they may revive again, and we may shaine as bright as heretofore.

Parthenia hearing her dear Argalus comforting himself after this manner, bewailing her self, and weeping, speakes to him thus: See Argalus, behold this Face of mine; by this thou plainly mayst perceive and understand, how unstable and unconstant the delights and pleasures of this World are, time alters all things; how often do we see a change in every thing that lives beneath the Sun; Beauty more fading is than all things else. The glorious dower 'tis true, doth soon wither and decay, yet it looks gay the whole Month's time that is appointed for it.
But Beauty, be it ne'r so fair, never so sweet and comely to behold, yet in a moments time we find 'tis blasted: one hours sickness turns the fresh and rosie Colour into a pale and wan complexion. Therefore, dear Argalus, set thy mind no more upon this World, or anything thererin, for vain and trifling are it's chiefest Glories. With that a flood of tears fell from her eyes, and grief would suffer her to speake no more.
Then Argalus made answere to his Love, My dear Parthenia, my only joy, I find you do mistake your Argalus still, think not on, Love, that this thy blasted Beauty, does or can any waystelfor my true Affections towards thee : 'twas not that I spake, which once appear'd like to an Angels, did cause me to admire thee, nor was it for those Star-like Eyes, which would have charm'd a Saint, that I ador'd thee, though these I must confess were pleasant to behold : But 'twas thy inward Virtue I admired, that was the precious Jewel I thus long have waited for : for I know it alone, that neither Sickness nor Distempers, of what sort soever, can change or alter, be it never so violent. A Virtuous mind will endure to the end, and that I found lodge safe within my Parthenia's Breast : for that I loved thee, and will do to my Death. Then think not the loss of Beauty shall delay our Marriage, for my Vows remain as firm to Heaven, as e're they did before. What hinders then, but that this very day thou mayst be Wedded to thy Argalus? With that she made him this faint Kephis, Talk not of Marriage, Argalus, to her, that scarce expects to live an hour longer : if I am Wedded, it must be to my Grave, and that's the liker Wedding of the two : but if I live, and live to over-grow this sad Affliction which is now upon me, my sacred Vows I surely will perform, and Argalus my Love, my honoured Lord, shall enjoy his own Parthenia.

Thus having said, she, with a far fetch'd sigh, desired of him, that he would forsake the Room, for she was willing to be alone ; But as she spoke these words, the Tears did fall down from her Eyes like drops in April showers. To see the parting of these two fond Lovers, would melt a Rock, and turn it into Tears : at last he bids farewell, and weeps aloud, and kissing of her hand is going out ; she with a mournful look does cast an eye after him, which he perceiving, has no power to go, but back again returns to her Bed-side : then both together weep, and sigh, and grieve, their passions were too great to utter words, their looks did speak, and make a plain discovery of their minds. Sometimes Parthenia holding fast his hand, would sobbing say, My Argalus adieu, Heavens protect thee till I see thee again ; but all the while his hand was linkt in hers. She would have him gone, nee cannot live without him ; he willing is to please her and depart the Room, yet knows not how to go, and leave her there in such a fainting griefing condition. Thus both did scribe, and both were overcome by Loves strong power: till nigh at late, then had wept so much, that they could weep no more. Argalus, with a sorrowful heart and discontented mind, kiss'd her soft and milk white hands a thousand times, then mournfully breath'd forth these following words: Farewell, farewell, my dear Parthenia, the Heavens protect thee my Love both night and day, do not disturb thy self for thy fore Face, but rest in peace and quiet, thy Adonis likes that Face well enough; But never fear, thy former Beauty will return, and that ere long. Let nothing trouble thee my dearest Love, thou knowest my constancy and true affection, will never change nor alter: before to Morrow Noon thy Adonis shall here again attend upon his sweetest Love, Parthenia. Thus having said, he went out of thee Room, and left her mourning by her self alone.

C H A P. III.

How Parthenia that very night, putting her self into Pilgrims Habit, betook her self to Travel, unknown to any. How Argalus coming the next Morning and finding that she was gone, makes pursuit after her; with the many Adventures he met withal in his Travels.

HE Argalus being gone, her miseries not increase, and very leath she was that he should see her blisster'd face any more: she resolved therefore that evening to make her escape out of her Chamber (the Moon then shinning) and fly to some place a good distance, where she was unknown: thus on a sudden she resolv'd to Travel. She took off the rives from her Bed, and put on a Pilgrims Habit, and girding her slender waist round about with a Leather Girdle and Staff in her hand, that night she left the Castle, and betook her self to wonder, but I know not she went as yet I cannot tell you: therefore we will leave the poor Parthenia for a time, and return to her in severance.

verance from the Jaws of Merciless Death, and from the hands of unmerciful Men, and that in safety the man again return.

Now must we come to Argale a while, and see what for he, poor Lover, undergoes.

Next Morning he with speedie haste comes riding up to the Castle, where he thought to find his dear Parthena in the darke Chamber where he left her (but the night before) but entering the Room with a light in his hand, he did by back the Curtains of the Bed, but no Parthena there could he find; I leave the Reader then to judge in what a distractiōn the pooz Prince was in. He rab'd and toze his hair, and down the stairs he violently runs, and in a fury calls forth all the servants, asking what was become of their young Lady? They trembling, andswered him with reverence, they could not tell, for they had not seen her since last night he left her: They went to wait upon her in the Morning, but found her gone, but whether they cannot tell. This answer from the servants struck him into a maze, but considering with himself in what a miserable condition he had left her over night, he thought that her affliction might cause her to travel into some remote part of the Country where she was not known, and change her habit for her own security; And truly he judged right, but it was more then he knew. However, he fainting of it so resolves to follow hard in the pursuit of his best beloved, and never to give over till he had either found her out, or ended his sorrowful and troublesome days in searching after her.

Having taken up this resolution, he mounts his lusty Steed, and with a nimble pace he takes the way he thinks most likely that she should be gone, but riding far, and bearing no tidings of her, he began to despair that he was not in the right Road, nor which way he should ride he cannot tell. Sometimes he takes the right-hand way, in hopes of good success, but all was to no purpose; then to the left-hand he turn'd in expectation that she was gone that way, but finds her not. Then over the ploughed fields

Fields he forz'd his Oare, and cross'd the wans into some pleasant Grove, exputing that she might take shelter there: but though he could not find her, the pleasantnes of the Grove did invite him to stay a while and rest his wearied Limbs. Neither was he idle all the time he staid there: for drawing forth his keen Sword of pure tempered Steel, upon the barkis of several smooth-rim'd Trees, he engraves the Name of his most dear Parthenia, and sets his own just by it; then up he mounts his nimble Steed again, and rides that Road which next he comes to, despairing of ever seeing her face more: however, he would ride on so long as he was able. At length this wearied Lover happens to come to the fountain of Diana, a place where he had heard Parthenia say she often had been, which was some comfort to his wearied Body, and great content to his distracte mind. He there dismounts his Horse, and goes to the Fountains head to drink some Water, thereby to quench his thirsly Soul. This pleasant Fountains head came out of a Rock, and the Water had a down into a large Cestern, hew'n out of a great Marble fall Stone, and on the out-side thereof was placed the lively Image of the Goddess Diana, with her Bow and Arrows by her side; and just before her were cut out of the same Stone two Dogs, the one looking up into her Face, the other hanging his head down smelling to her feet, and her hand was plac'd about his neck: Behind her was engraven several Virgin Nymphs, who always did attend the chaste Diana; but time, which wears out all things, by degrees had somewhat defac'd part of those lovely Pictures. At this same Fountain, in the dayes of old, the Country Corydons used to meet together, and there compose their Verles in praise of fair Philida, and the other pretty young Shepherdesses; and with their Oaten-Pipes did together play, striking who shoud play best, and innocently pass'd the time away.

When that the Noble Argalus had viewed all this, and quench'd his thirs with that most pleasant Water, he bathed his tired Body with the same: then up he mounts his Steed again, and rides which way blind fortune did conduct him ; sometimes he wandered through desert Wilderness, and by the way does meet with fierce Wild Beasts, some of them offering to seize upon him, but he had too much courage for to fear their rage. His Sharp Steel forth from his side he draws, and fencing with them, in a little time he proves himself to be a victorious Conqueror, and leaves them breathless on the barren ground. Amongst the rest, a Lyon did assault him, who wanted a prey at that time, being very hungry, which made his fury to much the more fiercer : The Prince leaps from his Horse with his drawn Sword in his Right hand, holding the Bridle in his left ; the Lyon roars, expecting to devour him in an instant, but it prov'd otherwise ; for as with open mouth he run up to him, Argalus chose his Sharp Sword into his mouth with such a force, that down he dropt quite Dead.

C H A P. V.

How Argalus after a Years Travel happen'd accidentally to come to the House of one Kalander, who was Parthenia's Uncle ; with the manner of Kalander's kind Entertainment.

BY this time wandering Argalus had spent twelve Monthes in searching for Parthenia, hard and laborious was the toil he undertook, but could not hear as yet a word of her : at length he happen'd into a smooth and pleasant Road, where on each side were most delightful Groves, in which the chirping Birds did sweetly sing, which cheer'd his drooping Spirits : soz as he ride along, he thought that every Bird hid strain his Note to sing Parthenia's Name. Thus musing, did he ride along that way so far, till at length he could spy before him a stately Building, whose out-side was most glorious to behold ; the running Water man had plaid his part to the life, from the bottom to the top thereof. This House, or rather I may call it a Palace, was seated in a most sweet and pleasant Valley, where pure Celestial Streams did gently run, and gliding by the House with a murmuring noise, did cause the pretty fishes in abundance to leap, and dance, and play, to great admiration. The little Hills like Walls and Bulwarks on every side, did compass round this Earthly Paradise. This sight did cause Argalus so to stand still a while, and looking every way, did bless himself to behold how many Flocks of Milk white Sheep were feeding in the most fruitful and flowry Meadows that were joining to this House: The pretty Lambs did skip and play, delightfully running round their Dams, till they were weary; then coming to the Dugs, which were stretched forth with Milk, they nourish'd and refresh'd themselves therewith, then up to play again. Also a multitude of every sort of Cattel were feeding near the house, either big with young, or having their young ones by them; as if that bountiful Nature had design'd that place to be the Store-house of all plenty. Thus having satisfied himself with the varieties of the out-side of this famous Building, he resolves with himself to try what Entertainment he could find within.

He boldip rides up to the out-ward Gate and knocking, which he need not do twice, for presently the watchful Porter opens the Gate, and desires him with humble reverence to enter in. He askt the Porter who was the Owner of that stately House? who told him that his Master's Name was Falander, a private Gentleman, but of a great Estate: and, just as if the Porter had known his business, he also told him, that the fair Parthenia's Mother, when she was alive, was sister to his Master. At this the blood did go and come in Argalus his face, hearing him name Parthenia, and that his Master was related to him. The Porter desired him to dismount himself, and leave his Horse to his care: and if he would be pleased to walk into the House, he need not question but that he should be kindly received, and nobly treated by his Master: for he took delight in Works of Hospitality, and being kind to Strangers.

Argalus

Argalus hearing what the Porter said, considered with himself that it could not be amiss for him to go into the House and make enquiry of Kalandar, whether he had not heard any tidings of his dear Parthenia; And with this resolution he crossing over a delicate Paved Court-yard, which led him to the House, into which he was no sooner enter'd, but he was very kindly received by a Servant who was always ready for that purpose, and desired to walk into a spacious Room adorned and beautified in a most curious manner.

The Servant very submissively desired him to seat himself, and his Master would wait upon him immediately. Thus having said, and Argalus being set down, the Servant leaves him for a while, and strait acquaints his Master of a Stranger that was come into the House to visit him, and that by his looks and habit, he appeared to be of no small quality, but of Sioyal Blood. Kalandar hearing of his Man's report concerning this Noble Guest, he with a more than ordinary haste dresses himself, to come and see the truth of what his Servant told him; and having entered the Room where Argalus was set, he, with a kind and honourable respect, salutes him thus:

Noble Sir, of what degree or quality you are I cannot tell, hower, thus far you may assure thy self, that how long so ever you are pleased to stay in this my House, you may command me, and what my ability can bid you kindly welcome to. Welcome you are Sir, therefore be free, and call for what your fancy leads you to: I flarter not, but love to Entertain the unknown Stranger as well as my best friend.

Argalus hearing of Kalandar's noble Speech, could not keep silent long, but thus returns his grateful and most thankful Answer:

Worthy Sir, if that you will be pleased to give me leave to speak, and honour me so far as to sit and hear me, I will relate unto you the true and perfect Story of my late misfortunes, which have occasioned me thus far to wander. A whole Years space is now expired and gone, since I betook my selfe this hard Travell; the reason why I stay thus far abroad, will make my mourn-full heart to bleed afresh to mention it, yet can I never banish from my mind the thoughts thereof. Then know, most Noble Sir, that in the pleasant and once happy Areadia, in King Easillus his Court, I did remain about Twelve Months since, the good Queen Cyrcia being related to me, both of us born in Cypres; and when Easillus had Marryed this fair Queen, I came along with her to the Areadian Court: my Name is Argalus, that unhappy Prince, who had not long been at the Court, but there I did espy the fairest Face that ever Nature fram'd: her Name was Parthenia, by Birth she was a Lady, but for all Excellencies she might be termed a Goddess.

~~At the repeating of these words, he breath'd forth a deep sigh which caus'd the Tears to trickle down his Face.~~

But to proceed, (quoth he) at the first sight of fair Parthenia, my heart was wounded by those Darts she shot forth from her charming Eyes: Cupid the God of Love at the self same time did also wound and pierce her tender heart, that both together loved and liked each other: which in short time was discovered, and made known amongst our selves, and by a mutual Vow to each other given, our Loves were firmly tied together: insomuch that the Wedding-day was set and appointed. I in the morning came to call upon my fair and sweetest Bride Parthenia, to go to Church to be Marry'd, but instead of being drest and ready to go forth, I found her lying in a Bed in a Dark Room, weeping and bemoaning of her self alone, and calling for a Taper speedily, I saw her Face all over swoln and blister'd; so much deformed; that never was poor Lady. Then after much Lamentation and great Mourning had passed between us, and the Evening drawing on, she was desirous that I should leave her for a time; then weeping did I part from my dear Love, promising to visit her the next morning. But oh unhappy fate! that very Night she left her Castle and fled away, the Gods alone knew whither: for from that time I never saw her Face, but am in search after her, if it be possible to find her out. Thus joy was turn'd to sorrow in a moment.

Kalander hearing of this sad Relation, and beholding Argalus his sorrowful Countenance, desired him to moderate.

rate his grief, and told him that he did bear a part of those his miseries: for Parthenia's Mother, whilst she lived, was his own Sister. Then was a stately Dinner brought in and set before them, such plenty at one time he ne'er had; all sorts of Wine were offer'd him to Drink, and Kalandar bid him welcome o're and o're. Now having been there some vappz, Kalandar invited him to go abroad to Hunt, and take some Recreacion, but Argalus refus'd him, desiring that he might rather be alone in his Chamber; therfore they did not urge him further.

C H A P. VI.

How Parthenia wondered till she came to the Queen of Corinthis, where she remained, and was Cured of her blemish'd Face. How she heard of Argalus's being at Kalandars, whither she went to him; with the manner of their greeting when they first met.

But as Kalandar was going forth to Hunt, a Messenger came in, and told him that there was a fair young Lady without, that desired her to stay one day and night in his House, to rest her self, and so depart next Morning. He bid them bring her in, but when he saw her, he blessh himself with admiration for a while: then speaking to her thus, Madam, quoth he, if I am not much mistaken, I knew that fair Face of yours, and by that Countenance of yours, you appear to be my Cousin Parthenia. Most Noble Sir, quoth she, do not you think that you wrong the fair Parthenia, in comparing me to her? yet truly some have flattered me, and said that I much resembled her. I Sir, am lately come from Corinth, from Queen Hellen's Court, she being my near Kinswoman, Madam, says Kalandar, for your own sake, and for the lost Parthenia's sake, you are kindly welcome. She humbly did return him many thanks, then being sat, and after much Discourse, Kalandar began to tell her the mournful Story of Argalus and Parthenia's Love; and as he told it, the Tears would drop down down from his Eyes apace ; but before he had done, she interrupted him, saying, Pray Sir tell me, did Argalus prove constant to the end ? Do you know where he is since these misfortunes ? How has he spent his time since she fled from him ? Madam, says Kalander, e're since that time, which now is full a Year, he spent his time in searching after her, and being weary, but a few days since he happened hither, where he yet remains in great distress and sorrow for her loss.

She then repented, Sir, let me beg the favour of you to see this generous Prince, in whose most Noble Breast lives so much Virtue and true Constancy ; I have a message to deliver to him.

Kalander hearing that, makes haste, and going up to Argalus, he told him that there was a young Lady below that fain would speak with him, having a message to deliver to him.

Argalus hearing this, comes down to her, and after some Complements past between them, she thus bespeaks him :

My Noble Lord, from Erin I am come, from fair Queen Hellen, who is my Kinswoman ; Not many days ago thither came therare Parthenia, so much deformed in her Face, as ever was poor Lady in this World ; She was so much altered, that I did not know her, till by some passages, she forced me to believe her. The Queen did bid her welcome, and was very careful of her health ; Parthenia having been there a while, beganto tell us the occasion of all her miseries and misfortunes, of which poor Lady, I bore an equal share. But as she told the dreadful Story, by the way she would often pity you, and praise your Constancy and Virtue above all other mens. And now Parthenia, instead of growing better, grew weaker and more sick, the Queens Phisitians did their best endeavours, but all in vain. One day she finding of her self to be nigh her end, call'd me to her Bed-side, and taking me first by the hand, she said : Sister, (for so she call'd me, because we were so much alike) go search throughout the World, and find my dearest Love and Prince, Argalus, and when thou hast found him, tell him that his Parthenia, with her dying breath, did give all right and claim that she had in him to me ; and pulling of a Ring, which you had given her, she gave it me, saying,

This

This shall witness that it was Parthenia's Will, that you should Marry me. Thus having said, and calling often on your worthy Name, she closed her Eyes, and turning from me, dyed.

Thus to fill her will, I have travell'd far, and now at length by good Fortune I have found you ; Return an Answer to a Virgins Suit, and such a pleasant one, as may bring comfort to her weary Travels.

The mournful Argalus full of grief and tears, to hear that his Parthenia was dead (for as yet he did not know that it was Parthenia which talked to him) returned her this Answer,

Madam, had my Parthenia liv'd, and had commanded me to perform a Task, more hard then ever mortal Man yet underwent, I gladly would have done my best endeavour to have satisfied her will to the utmost of my power : but she being dead, my Heart, my Soul, and all my Love is Buried with her ; a second Vow Argalus can never make, he has no more hearts to give ; but if in any thing else I can serve you, Madam, I shall be always ready at your command, whilst here I live, for my dear Parthenia's sake, with whom e're long I hope to be, and never from her to depart ; Though here on Earth we could not happy be, yet our true Souls in Heaven will meet with joy, where no quiet can disturb our peace.

She hearing this, with a seeming and forced frown, makes him this sudden Answer.

And must I be denied, quoth she, and slighted for my preferred Service ? is this the requital I now at last receive, for all my toilsome Travels ? These Actions look not well from yoe my Lord.

With that the sighing Argalus answered thus : Oh Madam, cease your Suit, and do not add more sorrows to my bitter afflictions, I cannot love no more, my sweet Parthenia has got all my love away. She then was able to hold out no longer, but leaping into his Arms, and clapping her Arms about his Neck, with joyful Tears she told him thus :

Yes Argalus, quoth she, you must love me ; here, take your own Parthenia, hold her fast in your Arms, I am thy own Parthenia, and still do live once more to kiss my lovely Argalus.

He hearing this, at first between hope and fear was dumb, and could not speak to her: but she quickly clear'd his doubts, saying, Remember Argalus, the flaming Taper which you blew out, standing by my Bed-side, and how of it self it revived again; even so our joys which have been clouded, shall now shine forth more glorious than before.

By this the Noble Argalus is sure that 'tis Parthenia, whom he does embrace. I leave the Reader now to judge how great the joys of these two Lovers were, I am sure no Pen is able to express them.

Sorrows be gone, and to Delight give way,
We now expect a joyful Wedding-day,

The Pleasant and most Delightful Hi- story, of ARG ALU S and P ARTHENIA, &c.

The Third P A R T.

C H A P. I.

Now, when the Wedding was appointed, with the manner of the great Pomp and State they solemnized it in.

Now once again these Lovers do rejoice in each others Company, all sorrows being over past and gone; Parthenia tells her Argalus, all the Adventures of her Journey, which the poor Lady underwent, when first she fled from her own Castle, how she past through great dangers and hardship, before she got to Corinth, to Queen Hellen's Court ; and how kind and carefull the Queen was of her, employing her own Chirurgens to dress her Face, and how in a short time they restored her to her former Countenance, though she was something alter'd, yet not less beautiful to behold : and after she was well again, how the Queen sent out Messengers to every part, to enquire after Argalus, who after long search brought word where he was ; and how the Queen sent her away honourably with guides, to conduct her to Kalanders House, where she found her Argalus ; and also told him, that the reason why she said Parthenia was Dead, was only to try his Constancy. These, and the like Stories being ended, the joyful Wedding-day grows near at hand, which being come, some part of their great Pomp and State I will relate to you, which was as followeth :

First Argalus, the glorious Bridegroom, did go gently on towards the Temple, a Thousand Trumpets went sounding before him ; his Cloaths which he did wear that day, were of a deep dy'd Scarlet, Embroydered all over with Gold, attended with no small number of Arcadian Nobles, he pass'd along, the multitude on each side standing thick to behold his gloriy : and as he went, they shouted with loud Voices, All joy to Noble Argalus, and his fair Bride. After him there follows a glorious Train of Ladies in rich and Costly Attire, their Godyngs were set with Gold and Pearl ; thus hand in hand they gently moved after the Bridegroom.

Next after them followed a Company of faire Virgins, cloathed all in Milk-white Silk, and on their Heads a Crown of Pavret gild with Gold, and a white Vail did cover their Faces : they also two by two did walk along. Next after them the faire Parthenia came, whose Beauty did as far excel the former, as the bright Moon excels the twinkling Stars ; a Vail of Milk White Silk did hide her blushing Face ; the Garment that she wore was made of Purple Silk, bespangled oze with Stars of purest Gold. Nine Virgins of an heighth and bigness, cloathed in Purple, followed her, holding up the Train

Thus all being come into the Church, the Priest as a token of their Innocence, had prepared two Milk White Turtle Doves, which he kill'd and burnt there to ashes ; afterwards reading the usual Ceremony, he joyned their hands, whose hearts were before united. Thus being done, they back again returned to Kalander's House, who had provided a sumptuous Dinner, abounding with all varieties which Tongue can exprest, or Heart can wish ; loud Musick sounded all the way they came, on every side of them, the people blessing them with endlesj joys. Now enter they into Kalander's House, and eat of every daintp he had provided for them, full Bowls of Wine go briskly round ; nothing but joy and mirth, mingled with sweet delight, is now perceived amongst this jovial Crew of Nobles.

This stately Dinner being ended, each gallant betook him to that sport he most delighted in ; but by the way, I must not forget to tell you, that there entered in a Gentleman Cloathed in Green, and his Face covered, who curiously sung this following Song :

A S O N G .

YE Gods above blest be your power,
Your Deities I will adore,
Smile on this Couple every hour,
From time to time and ever more :
Protect them from all future Danger,
Let sorrow to them be a Stranger.

Let length of days and endless pleasure,
Make them amends for all past trouble,
Let wealth flow to them without measure,
That so their joys on Earth may double :
Let health preserve them in their prime,
Free from Diseases all their time.

And as they both have but one Heart,
 So let them both together live,
 Death must not one from t'other part,
 One Dead, the other can't survive:
 One Coffin must two Bodies hold,
 One Grave will serve two of one mould.

What Earth doth yeld or Heaven afford,
 With those delights let them be Crown'd,
 With Nature's choicest Jewels stor'd,
 Whilst every Tongue long live doth sound,
 Why does not then the Mufick play,
 We'll dance and sing the time away.

This Song being ended, the Voice was so sweet, and sung with so great judgment, that it rabisht every ear that heard it; then was a Dance performed by thzee young Gentlemen and thzee young Virgins, to the admiration of all beholders. By this time this joyful Wedding-day was spent, and the night (which was most welcome to the happy Bridegroom, and the blushing Bride) was now at hand, he wist it had come sooner, she wist the same, but her desires were mingled with fears; But now the time is come, she must to Bed. The Ladies who had been at the same post, do softly whisper in her ear, and bid her go with them into the Bride-Chamber: she smiling on them, yields to their request; then up they go together, where they imploy their nimble hands to undres her curious Body: which being done, they put her into Bed, persuading of her, that it was a pleasant pain to lose a Maiden-head, with a Man she lov'd.

The halfe Bridegroom quickly follows after, being stopally attended by the Nobles that were his honourable Guests that day; they soon put off his fayre Robes, he being as ready to help them, as they were willing to undres him; for seeing his fair Parthena in her Naked Bed, he scarce had patience to stay whil'st they undressed his shinges, but with his own hands did tear them allunder.

his longing desire would admit of no delays: then into Bed unto his blushing Bride he goes, with eager speed, and with a smiling kiss he first salutes her, whil'st the rest of the company bestowed their time in merry Jests, and pleasant Discourses, each young Lady that was there unmarried, wishing that joyful night had been their own. The Bridegroom now desires they would depart the Room, for their company was troublesome at present, they being sensible of his longing condition, departed and went down stairs, and there they spent the whole night in Singing and Daineing, drinking each of their Ladies healths in full Bowls of Wine.

The morning now appearing, and the blushing Sun breaking through the Eastern Clouds, steals into the Bride-Chamber and peeps between the Curtains, where he espies the fair Parthenia, with her Eyes close shut, lying on her Back, by Argalus his Side, his Right Arm gently grasping her slumbering Body, and looking in her Face, he smiling, sometimes kiss'd her pretty Cheeks, and often did he join his Lips with hers; at length the Sun beams through the Chamber Window did shine so bright, that dazzling of Parthenia's Eyes, she awakes: and at first waking, starts to find a Man in Bed with her, but soon that fear was turned to joys, when she beheld Was Argalus her dearest. Argalus! Oh then she smil'd, and smiling turns her to him, and then, Oh then they did — but what then did, my Pen commands me to conceal, least that some Female Reader perhaps should long to take those pleasures which this Amorous Couple did then enjoy; therefore I leave you for to guess the rest, whil'st I proceed to tell the next days sport and pastime.

The morning being far spent, the Musick now with sweet delightful sounds bids them good morrow, whil'st that the jocund company belowe sits nodding, some in one Corner and some in another, not able to hold up their sleepy Heads; only the servants, they no rest must take, but are busie in making clean the Rooms, and setting everthing in their right order, against the rising of the Pe-

ble

Noble Bridegroom and his Beautiful Bride; which was no sooner done, and all things were made neat and clean, but down comes Argalus and his fair Parthenia; then every sleeping Soul rous'd up his Spirits, and having had about an hours rest, were pretty well refresh'd; they first salute the Bridegroom and his fairest Bride, with everlasting joys and happiness: then after they had pleas'd themselves with merry and pleasant Discourse, asking the Bride how she liked her Bedfellow? she answering them in no other Languages but bashful blushes, the Lovers were presented with a Song.

S O N G.

ALL Joys to Parthenia the Queen of Delight,
Who now knows the sweets of a Man in the Night;
Then blush not fair Bride because they are past,
Though they were the first, yet they won't be the last.
In publick pastime all the day we will spend,
But when the night's come,
In your own private Room,
Each Hour will bring you new joys to the end.

The Bridegroom is lusty with youthful desire,
Your Eyes kirdle Flames which his Blood set on Fire:
Such Amorous Beauty does tickle each vein,
One look his spent Courage will quicken again;
Till equally wearied, you both seek for rest,
And sleeping a while,
Sweet time do beguile,
Then waking again, with new pleasures are blest.

Thus may you embrace till together you prove,
The fruitful encrease of your Innocent Love:
Your off-Spring will credit and shew what you have done,
The Princely sweet Babe when he's born will be known,

To be the own Son of his Father Renownd:

So like him he'll be,

In his Face, that you'll see.

He in his ripe Age mull with Glories be Crown'd.

The Song being ended, they again prepared themselves to Daunce, which briskly they performed to the great contentment of all beholders, each striving to excel the other in every action.

Thus did they continue their Recreations for a whole weekes time with so much pleasure and delight, that every day seem'd but one bare hour: and Kalander thought himself to be the happiest Man in the whole World, that his House was honoured with such Noble Guests; But Noble Argalus did now think long to see his own Native Countrey, and thereupon resolves within a day or two to take his fair Wyde Parthenia with some Attendants, and ride to Cypres to his own Castle; the Sioyal Company thereupon began to seperate themselves, every one to his proper Habitation.

C H A P. II.

How Argalus with his Parthenia and Attendants, went into his own Country, taking Kalander along with them.

Then Argalus and Parthenia took their leaves of the most worthy Kalander, who had been a Father to them all the while they remained in his House; a thousand times then thanked him for all his favours and kindnesses which he had shewn them and the rest of their friends, which had received such extraordinary well-comes at his hands. But Noble Kalander perceiving that their inclinations were to leave him, he with entreaties, begg'd of them to stay longer: saying, That he took so great felicity in their Companies, that by no means he could not let them depart from him. But Argalus told him that it was now a great while since he came from his own Country, and he could not satise himself, till he had carryed his dear Parthenia thither, and made her Lady of his own possessions. Parthenia seeing Kalanders sorrowful Countenance, spoke kindly to him, and desired him, that he would be please'd to ride along with them, and bear them company to Cypress; at first he see'd unwilling to leave his house and Family, but her winning speech, and the delight he had to be were Parthenia and her dearest Argalus were, at length over-perswaded him, so as he went along with them.

great

They were not long in performing their Journey, be fore they came to Cypress, where they were received with more joy and gladnes then Tongue can exprest, or Pen can write; the Bells did ring all night and day, the Bonfire did shine in every Street, and every one with Tongue and Heart exprest their joy to see them, and with loud voices did proclaim their welcome.

Kalander there was entertained with great state, Argalus and his fair Parthenia shewing him all the respect and civility imaginable. But he having seen them safe at home, and having tarred there a month or two, began to consider of his own Affairs: he therefore told them that he was now willing to return to his own Habitation which they were loath to hear of, but knowing of his occasions, would not hinder him: at last shewing to each other abundance of kindness, with thanks on every side for all civilities, Kalander departed into his own Country.

C H A P. III.

How King Basilus sent a Letter to Argalus, desiring his assistance in fighting a Single Combat with Amphialus his utter Enemy: with Argalus his Condescension to the Kings desire, and his departure from Parthenia. Argalus his Letter of Challenge to Amphialus, with Amphialus his Answer.

When he was gone, the Noble Argalus and his Parthenia pass'd the time away, sometimes in Hunting, sometimes in reading pleasant Histories, and sometimes in visiting other Lords and Ladies, who much desired their pleasant company. But not long after, there came a Messenger from King Basilus out of Arcadia, and gave a Letter into Argalus his Hand, which he opened and read, and bid the Messenger tell the King, that he would be sure to wait upon him.

The Messenger being gone, Parthenia in a maze, ask'd what's the matter, and what the Letter signified? poor Argalus unwilling was that she should see it, would fain have satisfied her with some other story, but the more he endeavoured to put her by, the more eager she was to know the business, mistrusting that there was some danger in the Letter, and would not rest till she had seen it: which having read, it made her more restless then ever she was before. Sometimes she read, and then a tear would fall, with sighs so strong you would think her tender heart would break; at last having read it over, she thus spake to him. Oh Argalus! my dearest Argalus! how could you return so quick an Answer to this Letter? what! are you weary of your poor Parthenia? Then the Tears did flow so fast from her Eyes, which caused her to make this mournful Speech. This

To the Renowned Prince Argalus.

WHereas Amphiaku (the Prince of Fame) does dayly incroach upon our Liberties in an hostile manner, and not only offers abuse to my Subjects, but has unawares surpriz'd my only Daughter, and taken her away by force, keeping her Prisoner in his own Castle, and will not let her go with any Arguments that I can use ; but answers my demands after this manner, telling me, that if I have any Knight that will venture his life with him in a single Combat, and if the Knight overcomes him, then shall my Daughter be restored : but if he prove Conqueror, then will he keep her to himself. I therefore knowing of your Valour and great Courage, and withal being related to me, have desired your affiance in this matter,

BASILIUS KEX.

Parthenia now renewes her soye complaint, Oh Argalus (quoth she) why should you promise the King to be his Champion ! Oh why should you hazard that dear life which is none of your own ? Your life is mine, and every wound that Argalus receives, Parthenia's heart will feel the smart, and bear the torment which you undergo ; The King might have found out some other Man less worthy than your self, who might have vindicated his just Quarrel. My Argalus shall not go, no, he must not go, and leave his poor Parthenia here behind him, to dye with grief.

Argalus pittping of his mournful Bride, desired her to cease her tears and grief, telling of her, that the justnes of the cause gave him a full assurance that he should be Victor, and that in honour he could do no less than grant the King's request : He having gained Parthenia's consent, the next morning early he buckled on his Armor, which was made of hardened Steel, bedeckt with knobs of Gold, girded on his Sword about his Loins, ordered his Servant to bring forth his Lusty Steed ; with his Lance in his hand he was going to mount himself, but Parthenia hanging about his neck, would not suffer him yet to go : saying thus, My Argalus, my Dear, let me beg of you for Heavens vens sake, and for Parthenia's sake, do not go and leave me ; if this won't do, I beg for the sake of thy own dear Babe, which is engendered within my Womb, stay here with me, and do not leave me thus tormented with grief and sorrow. With that she fell upon the ground and swooned, which Argalus seeing, left her to the care of her Maids, and giving them a strict charge over her, he mounts his horse and rides away unto the Arcadian Court ; Where being come, the King received him with great joy : and having spent a day or two in discoursing of State Affairs, and how Amphialus had layng'd him upon several accounts, but most of all in carrying away his Daughter by stealth, and now keeping her unjustly from him by force ; without telling him that Amphialus would not restore her, unless he were Conquered by a single hand, so much he boasted of his own Valour and Courage. Argalus told the King that he was come to end that Dispute, and thereupon he wxit a Letter to Amphialus after this manner :

Renowned Amphialus,

If reason could have ruled your actions, it would have been much better in my Opinion ; but since you will not hear a good and Gracious King's request, who asks for nothing but his own, I cannot think that you will submit your self to my demands ; therefore since it is your own proffer to refer the busines to a single Duel, I am the Man who will justifie the King's right, and therefore desire you to meet me to morrow morning ready arm'd, about Nine of the Clock, upon the plain on this side the River, which runs and parts your Dominions and the Arcadian Land : not doubting but the justness of my cause will help and assist me in the Fight.

ARGALUS.

Argalus had no sooner received the Letter, but back by the same Messenger he sent this Answer.

Much more Renowned Argalus,

IAm sorry that your judgment should be so much mis-inform'd, as to think that ever I should offer any injustice to King Basilus; however, since he takes it so, and you are plead'd to vindicate his quarrel, I'll be fure to meet you at the place and time appointed.

AMPHIALUS,

C H A P. IV.

The Discourse that happen'd between Basilus and Argalus before he went to the Combat, as also the manner of the Combat. How they parlied together, and how Parthenice came to them a little before the Death of Argalus; as also the bitter Lamentation she made for his loss.

THe time being come, the Noble Argalus rises early in the Morning, and puts on his Armour, and all things were brought to him which were useful for the Fight; but before he mounted his Steed, the King, wishing him good success, spoke to him thus:

Most Noble Argalus, and Renowned Kinsman, I wish you may return Victorious; that so you may, my Prayers shall be sent up to Mars, the great God of War, during the time of your Combat; that he would help you, and that you may Conquer this our publick Enemy: and for your kindness shewn to me in this Encounter, assure your self, that it will ever oblige me to you. If you at any time should stand in need of my help, I my self, with all the strength and power of my Dominions, will be aiding and assisting to you: Then go my Noble Champion, go on and prosper: a Kings Prayers, and a distressed Virgins Petition to just Heaven, shall bring thee back again with joy and honour.

The King having ended his Prayers, and good wishes for Argalus his prosperity, the Noble Argalus with a bold and cheerful look, returned the King this thankful Answer,

Most Gracious and Royal Sir, my Courage yet no Man could ever daunt; Amphialus is not the first Man that I have met in the open Field; none ever yet have escaped my furious rage, when a just cause hath call'd for strict revenge: but especially now, I have sufficient encouragment to summon all my valour, and never doubt a speedy Conquest over this bold and daring Foe Amphialus, having your good wishes, and an injured Ladies powerful Petitions on my side. I alſo am assured, that my dear Parthenia will never ceaſe, but on her bended knee perpetually will beg at Heaven for my ſafe return: all which well conſidered, affures me of a Conqueſt before I do begin the Combat. But if the cruel Fates ſhould prove unkind, and work my overthrew, this favour I humbly beg of you, moſt Royal Sir, that you would be a Father to her when I am gone.

Thus having ſaid, he took his leave, and ſet forward to meet his Enemy.

Now Argalus is come upon the Plain, where he had ap- pointed to meet Amphialus, where long he had not been, but he ſpyes his Enemy ready Armed to decide the Quarrel. They meet together, and thus ſaluted each other.

Argalus firſt ſpoke to him in this manner, Sir, Here I am come, either to have ſatisfaction from you by word of mouth, in acknowledging the injuries you have done the good King Basilias, alſo in promising that you will restore and tend home his Virgin Daughter, whom you unjustly keepe; or elſe to ſtand to the force of this my Sword, which is here ready to take revenge for those great and moſt horrible abuſes which you have offered him. To whom the bold Amphialus replies, Moſt valiant and moſt worthy Argalus, thoſe acts which the King calls injuries, I count moſt juſt, and with my Sword and Launce I here am come to prove them ſo. If that I am Coquered by ſo Noble and Courageous a Champion as your ſelf, it will be no disgrace for me to die and fall by ſuch a Conquering hand as yours: But if the Stars ſhould prove ſo kind to me, as that I happily ſhould Conquer you, then I am ſure that none alive will dare to be your ſecond; but everlasting Honour and Renown will ſit and ſmile upon my Conquering Brow. And now Sir, with theſe Resolu- tions tions I am prepared to try which of us two shall prove most fortunate. Thus having said, both of them did back a little space, that so they might have room to meet with the greater force; then with a swit speed they did up to each other, pushing one another with their Lances, and with an equal strength they stod so long, that both of them were thrust from off their Horses backs, and fell together upon the ground, neither of them having any harm at all: then rising up, they threw their Lances by, and drew forth their bright and well tempered Swords, and now the bloody Combat begyn, strong blows upon each others Armes fell thick and hard, yet their Swords could not cut through them; till Argalus at length enraged with fury, struck such a terrible blow upon Amphialus his arm, that he made his Arme yeld, and cut his Arm not a veray deep wound, yet pretty broad: at that Amphialus his blood did boil, which did enrage him, and provoked his fury so much, that now he lays about him with double Courage, and striking hard upon Aargalus his Arme, his Sword made an impression on his side, but did him little harm: Then both laid on with heavy stroaks, till both were almost tired; but that their Spirits was too great too faint, so long as either had a drop of blood left in their veins: at length Amphialus with an unlucky strooke, cut Argalus a deep wound on his right Arm, from whence did flow a main stream of blood, which disabled him in this Encounter, but in the heat of blood he sei'd it little. Then in great rage he took his Sword in both his hands, and lifting it up, struck Amphialus such a blow between the head and Shoulders, that had his fortune been as good as was his Courage, Amphialus had never been able to have made any resistance, nor struck another blow: but as it happened, his Sword did glance a little towards the Arm, that so he saved his Life, receiving only a deep wound just by the Shoulder-bone; but fortune favour'd him so much, that it miss the Veins, which preserved his blood, that he bled but little. Then did they both with all the force and strength they had redouble their blowes, blowvs; but Argalus being weakest of the two, by reason that he bled so much, received moze bounds from Amphialus his Sword, than he was able to return again. At length Amphialus finding that Argalus grew weak, and that he had a great advantage over him, he ceas'd his blowvs, and spake to him after this manner. Argalus, since Fortune hath so favour'd me, that having lost but little blood, I plainly can perceive, that now at present I am stronger than you are: however, I am not willing to take the least advantage of your weaknes, but had rather, that we both should leave off shedding more blood, and take our leaves on each other on equal terms. This I do beg of you, to let you know that Amphialus is not willing to rob you of so Noble a Life. Argalus hearing of him, made this reply: No, no, Amphialus, you are much mistaken, Argalus never yet knew what it was to yield, nor will he now begin; but so long as I have ever a drop of blood left in my body, I'll vindicate the King's just quarrel against you his unworthy Enemy. With that they both begin to fight again. But now let me beg your attention a while, till I speak a little concerning Parthenia, who all this while remains in misery. It seems that the night before the Fight began, Parthenia Dreamt that she saw her dearest Lord, and beloved Husband, Prince Argalus, lie wallowing in his own precious Blood almost Dead, the very thoughts thereof did strike such terror, and caus'd such fear in her tender Breast, that she in the Morning early, attended with two or three Servant-Maids, each riding single upon a Horse, comes unto the place where they were fighting, and leaping from her Horse, run in betwixt their Swords, and falling at Amphialus his feet, she humbly begg'd that he would hold his hand, and strike no more upon her Argalus; but his fury was so great, that he could not satisfie himself without shedding of more blood, with tears and sighs she then desired him that he would turn his hand, and accept of hers, for she could better spare her blood than he could. Amphialus seeing so much Beauty lie at his feet suing for Argalus his life, admired and gazed upon her, having no power to strike one blow: but Argalus, who

Was scarce able to stand, with anger moved, made this reply, What must my Life be begg'd by a Woman? No, it shall not be, I will fight as long as I have power to stand; and if it be my fate so soon to die, it shall be said I die a noble death. With that he struckt at Amphialus with all the force he had, whilst he offer'd not to strike him at all, but did his best endeavour to avoid his blows. At length poor Argalus his strength being almost quite spent, he leaning upon the Hilt of his Sword, stagger'd a while, then fell down almost dead: the poor Parthenia did bestow her time in rubbing of his Temples, that so she might revive his fainting Spirits: she rent her Linnen Sleeves and wapt about his gaping wounds; and wanting strings, she pluckt her curions hair from off her head to bind the Cleath's upon the Wounds of her dear Argalus, and often did she kiss his lips, that now grow cold and pale; But Argalus seeing her so careful, with a sigh desired her to forbear, telling her, that now it was too late, for he was past all hopes of Cure: and desiring her again and again to be contented with what the Gods had decreed, for they would assuredly protect her from all danger as long as she liv'd, and when her Glass was run, and Death had seized her, she then should come to him, where they should dweli together for ever, bles'd with true joys, and with eternal rest. More he would have said, but that his breath fail'd him, that he was farrer to take his leave of her, by giving of her a sweet kiss, then bid farewell and died.

Parthenia's grief was now so great, that it drove her into distraction for a while: at last her reason did perswade her to send one of her Maids to get a Verse, which was immediately brought, and his dead body was conveyed to his own Castle, where he was embalmed, and lay in State.

And now Renowned Argalus is gone and left his poor Parthenia behind him, so full of grief and sorrow, that it is impossible for her to live long after him; but longing to be with him, yet not willing to be guilty of self-murder, her Virtue would not give her leave to kill her self, she with her self takes up a resolution to fight Amphialus.

C H A P. V.

How Parthenia cloathing her self in black, and putting on black Armor, sends a Challenge to Amphilus, in the name of an unknown Knight. How Amphilus and she met and fought, and how Parthenia was kill'd; as also how King Easdius bury'd Argalus and his Parthenia in one Tomb with great State, in Arcadia.

She first caused a Suit of Black Armoz to be made of a small size, according to her bigness; which being done, she sent a Challenge to Amphilus, in the name of an unknown Knight, who desired him to meet at the same place where Argalus lost his Life by his Sword; there to decide the quarrel which he left unperformed, too morrow Morning. The Messenger carries this Challenge, and brings back word, That Amphilus would not fail to meet this daring Knight, let it be who 'twould.

Parthenia then gets up early in the Morning, and attireth her self in this black Armoz, putting on a Helmet of the same Colour, and girt a Sword about her tender Body, and mounts her self upon a Col black Steed, and takes with her clere of her Waiting Maids Cloathed all in black in Men's Habit. Thus she rode along till she came to the place appointed, and there she met Amphilus her utter Enemy. She made no way to parley with him, but with an eager force rides at him, and endeavours to the utmost of her power to disable him, but her weak Arm could and smot him; then leaping from her Horse she left her Sword, and threw her Lanee aside: he likewise seeing that, dismounted too, and drew his Sword, not thinking that it was a Woman that he had to deal with; then both do strike at each other with eager force, till Amphalus perceiv-ing that this unknown Knight was too weak for him, he then ceas'd his blows, and spake after this manner: Sir Knight, quoth he, your Name I do not know; however, I wish you so well, as to put up your Sword, and seek not to destroy your self by fighting with me, who never did you wrong. With that Parthenia, who was this unknown Knight, replied thus: Base Man thou lyest, and this my Sword shall make thee acknowledge it before I go. Amphalus

not able to endure such wordz from any knyght, with his Sword he gave her such a vistu upon the head, that she fell to the ground, and afterwards a thrust into her Wopp, that he perceiv'd
the wound was mortai: he then unlaid her Bel- met, and pulling it offe he knew her face, and thus he made his moan: Ye Gods, why did you suffer me to do this deed? must all my Glories thus be stain'd in one moments time? shall it be said that Amphalus Conquer'd a Woman in the open Field?
Oh miserable wretch that I am! I wish that hand of mine had been cut off, e're I had kill'd the fair Par- thenia. With that he kneeling to her, said. Madam, let me beg of you to pardon this my unknown offence,
and weeping bitterly for what he had done, he endeavoured to keep life in her, by rubbing of her face;
but she would not suffer him to touch her, but made him this Answer, Yes, Amphalus, I do forgive you, for now my wished hour is come: now all the World adieu, farewell all earthly vanities, farewell. Now my dearest Argalus make room for thy poor Parthenia, whose Soul hath taken wing, and is coming to thee. Thus having habing said, she turn'd away her face and dyed. Her Maides took care of her Body, and with great lamentation convey'd it to the Castle, and laid it by the side of her dear Argalus; which when the King Basilius heard, he sent a great Train of Mounters, who brought both their Bodies in great state to Arcadia, where after sorry days of Mourning were performed, he caus'd them to be intombed both in one Tomb, where it is said the Arcadians do sacrifice once a year two white Doves, in token of those two Lovers' Constancy.

Thus may we see how worldly joys do fade,
One hour they shine, the next they find a shade.

FINIS.